UK-Rhodesia: Negotiations probably will be resumed today or tomorrow. The two sides have made no definite progress on the major point of dispute--London's demand for a procedure that will permit a review of future constitutional amendments by the British Privy Council in order to protect black African constitutional rights. At the end of last week's session, however, Rhodesian Prime Minister Smith intimated that some such safeguard against retrogressive legislation might be needed. The UK, for its part, agreed to offer options to the Privy Council proposal if other differences could first be resolved. Tough bargaining remains ahead, as London will be very reluctant to make further concessions.
